

A million shards of song

She held white lines of glass on her tongue
Sharp enough to cut words into empty caverns and coffins Where today no one would see them tucked Away carefully and shielded from the masses
She beseeched them to dissolve
But instead they fled
To carve craters into lakes and laughter into sand
And spread their sparkling splinters
Among the bottled tongues of strangers